TRAINING APPRENTICES.

Novel System Adopted by a British Manufacturing Firm.

According to United States Consul Mahin, a firm at Lincoln, England, extensively engaged in the manufacture of agricultural and other machinery, has introduced something new in the line of an apprenticeship system which is attracting attention throughout Britain and is receiving much favorable comment. He says:

"The rule in England is to bind a boy for seven years, from the age of fourteen to twenty-one, during which period he leads a narrow, treadmill life. The Lincoln firm, however, takes apprentices at any age between fifteen and twenty-two, one inducement to this change being the expectation that boys of sixteen to eighteen will have had a good school education and will therefore be better fitted than a boy of fourteen to master the trade. To encourage boys at sixteen to eighteen years to become apprentices the same wages will be paid them as if they had begun at fifteen."

"But the most important part of the Lincoln firm's new apprenticeship system is to give all deserving apprentices a varied shop experience and to supplement the shop work with courses of instruction bearing directly thereon. By combining mental training with shop work it is believed that more intelligent workmen will be evolved than under the old system. The general scheme is this:

"Apprentices will be moved from one class of work to another at the discretion of the firm. Diligence, skill and proficiency will be held to constitute a claim for transference to another class of work. Keeping a boy on routine work simply because he has become skillful at it will, so far as possible, be avoided."

"All apprentices are under a superintendent, whose sole duties are to supervise, teach, promote and advise. The firm maintains its own school in the works, and all apprentices can attend classes free. Books and utensils are provided by the firm. Officials of the firm take part in the work of teaching the apprentices and in general deal with subjects in which they are specialists. It is among the duties of the superintendent to prevent an apprentice from 'drifting' through the works, to protect boys from favoritism or the opposite in the works and to report to the firm cases of merit or demerit."

Each figure in a first class warwork exhibition has to be remade every four or five years. The wax loses its color and becomes soft and spongy after that time.
